Meass. Entrons:—In looking over the looking over the subject of superamoated bruiser, whome every of superamoated bruiser, whome every body that thinks it worth the trouble, the subject, from the pen of your con this subject, which is of importance to every farmer.

As to planting in rows, east and west, I believe his reasoning is correct. But I believe his reasoning is correct. But I believe his reasoning is correct as to the best manner of securing corn and corn stalks in sattam. My plan is something like this statem, My plan is something like this statem. At white the subject is to gother in a shock to stand sufficiently firm; then secure it with two of these together in a shock to stand sufficiently firm; then secure it with two of these longly and in this way until sufficiently dry to be considered in the word subject to the person that in this way until sufficiently firm; then secure it with two of these longly firm; then secure it with two of these longly firm; then secure it with two of these longly firm; then secure it with two of the subject of the mails, and the control our shall be word and careful in this way until sufficiently dry to be considered in the subject of the subj shocks, is about four pounds per ousuer shocks, is about four per ousuer shocks, is a shock for per ousuer shocks, it is a shock for per ousuer shocks and the shock for per ousu when cut up before it is killed by the frost, the sap then in the stalk goes to maturing the ear.

His picture of a person seated upon a bundle of damp corn stalks, endeavoring to extricate the slippery, half-rotten ears from their mouldy coverings, is a picture of some slap dash farmer, who leans his corn against the fence, or pole set up for that purpose, to avoid the trouble of shocking. When such a course is a sued mouldy, half-rotten and slippery cars are all that common sense would look for. But try fairly the plan I have laid down, and when husking time comes you will find your corn sound and dry; and be-sides, you will have the thanks of your dumb saimals for the excellent fodder. W. CORN BLADES FOR HORSE FODDER .-Of all the cut and dried stuff for choice horse fodder, there is nothing equal to corn blades, and no where else within the range of our observation is this so well understood as in Kentncky and Tennessee. We were in the training stables of John M. Clay, near Lexington, Ky., in the last of May, when all fodder was very scarce, and there we saw the cured corn blades in perfection. We felt of them and smelt of them, and congratulated his
